

Use of playgrounds and sporting fields during the flood recovery

People in flood-affected communities should avoid unnecessary skin contact with mud from floods, including at playgrounds and sporting fields, to minimise health risks. These health risks can include wound infections, dermatitis, conjunctivitis, and ear, nose and throat infections. People should exercise caution before using facilities until the ground has been cleared of any debris that may have flowed on to the fields with the flood water. It is recommended that sporting fields and playgrounds should be allowed to dry before use. Keeping the grass short will help the drying process. It can be expected that exposure to sunlight will dry the surface, quickly reducing any additional microbiological contamination that might have come from the flood water.

Surfaces under play equipment, such as swings and slides in local parks, may also have been contaminated during flooding. It is recommended that these surfaces are hosed with clean water and are allowed to dry before play equipment is used. If the play equipment has been immersed in flood water, it also should be hosed with clean water and allowed to dry before use.

As per usual practices, anyone using sporting fields or playgrounds should wash their hands thoroughly afterwards, especially prior to eating or drinking.
